Bris 6 C. June 20th 1838

My dear Sir.

Mr. Chapman appears me that the transmission of this bill packet to Boston will cost cost about £9.

As it is Miss Parkes's wish that this copy to Douglas should go free of expense, I must at least inclose what would be his share of carriage according to Chapman's calculation, tho' I am by no means sure that the Am. Post office will not make some addition.

If this mode of sending be not extravagant, it is a very convenient one to me. Pray inform me what you will pay for this Journal!

I hope it may also be convenient to you to let Douglass have his copy of the Immortality.
If you will do this to enable to pay his bookbill, I shall be you will please with this
mode in which it has been bound.

Miss Parker, who is in the habit of Adams is very desirous that the only remaining copy of this work, undiscovered by Lieutenant Lloyd, should be presented to you.

The labours bestowed by Mr. P. in making this discovery of G. D.'s manuscript entitle her to much credit for zeal in your cause.

I considered myself fortunate to find a sort of organ bloweress the occasion, in collecting funds for the printing of 500 others, all of which are paid for. The amount was £24. The publication is nearly got out.

Our Minister's in London are interesting. Our influence are made to your country. Anti-subscriptions is getting discouraged amongst us. Last Saturday's Inquirer pleas an account of the debate in Congress, & Mr. Webster's speech on Thursday for the next No. as fuller a statement of his views

Believe me, my dear sir,

Sincerely Yours,

J. B. Linn
